The Net Neutrality Lawsuits Are Coming. Here's What They're Likely to Say.

Because of the potentially far-reaching consequences of the FCC's vote on net neutrality, consumer groups and some state attorneys general have vowed to sue the agency to overturn its decision, writes Brian Fung in an article for The Washington Post.

Some analysts told the reporter that the first suits could be mere weeks away.

"Opponents of the FCC are expected to make two broad categories of arguments, analysts say," Fung writes. "One thrust is likely to target the FCC's legal reasoning for undoing the net neutrality rules, and the other will concentrate on the decision-making process that led to the vote, which some critics claim had been 'corrupted'."

Read the Post article.