

What Did I Agree To? Importance of Reviewing Arbitration Provisions

The law firm Polsinelli recently defeated a motion to dismiss a client's judicial review of an arbitration award, successfully arguing that adopted arbitration rules that waive appellate rights do not waive a party's right to judicial review under the Federal Arbitration Act.

A post on the firm's website introduced the case:

The case presented a conflict between the parties' contractually-adopted arbitration rules and an individual party's statutory rights under the FAA. Although ultimately successful, the case served as an important reminder for parties to thoroughly review contractual arbitration provisions – and any procedural rules referenced therein – before agreeing to them.
