Replacing Alimony Payments with Homes Sales

AnnouncementsDivorces can take a toll on all parties involved, especially when negotiations and other issues take years to resolve. What makes them even more complicated is when one party refuses to comply with agreements and court-ordered alimony payments. Defying a court order is a dangerous game to play and judges show little remorse for individuals who toy with the judicial system. Ignoring alimony payments or any court-mandated agreement is a sure way to lose more assets than initially expected. For example, a case in New Jersey, W.S. H. v V. I. P recently saw a non-precedential decision that ordered the defendant to sell a vacation home to pay arrears. The defendant failed to pay the plaintiff alimony and equitable distribution for several years and ultimately lost an expensive asset as a result.

What Matters in The End – Family Law

AnnouncementsEven though it’s difficult, divorce can deliver much-needed clarity about what matters in life. In a marriage, a lot of time is spent making decisions together. What car should we buy? Where should we live? Should we have kids? What color should we paint the living room? At the time, they seem like significant decisions, and more times than not, one partner makes a compromise. Some compromises are easy but making compromises to keep the peace can be a way to avoid tough conversations, and by doing that, you genuinely sacrifice yourself.
