Choose Words Carefully in Dispute-Related Contract Clauses

A couple of words here or there in a contract can make a huge difference, particularly when those words relate to what happens if there is a breach or some other dispute between the parties, writes Shep Davidson in Burns & Levinson's blog, The In-House Advisor.

He discusses the case of Family Endowment Partners, L.P. v. Sutow.

That case involved a lawsuit that resulted in a $48 million award to the plaintiffs in a ruling issued by an arbitrator. Part of the award included triple damages. Davidson explains how some simple changes in the contract could have avoided much of the defendant's loss.
