

Columbia Awarded $185 Million in Patent-Infringement Lawsuit

"Columbia University was awarded slightly over $185 million in damages Monday by a federal jury that found that NortonLifeLock Inc. willfully and literally infringed two patents related to groundbreaking cybersecurity safeguards invented by Columbia professors, according to a press release from the university," reports Marjorie Valbrun in Inside Higher ED

"The award was the result of a unanimous verdict stemming from a two-week trial in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia. Columbia brought the case in December 2013. The jury awarded the university $185,112,727 in reasonable royalties on the two patents through Feb. 28 of this year, the press release said, adding that the "finding of willful and literal infringement means the Court also has discretion" to triple the actual or compensatory damages."

Read the article.