

What Parts of a Legal Practice Can Be Automated?

An article on the website of ContractRoom considers some of the advanced legal technology options that exist to assist in most of the daily functions of practicing law today.

These functions include legal research, document review and evidence compilation, synthesizing research and developing a case, writing legal advice, drafting documents off templates, drafting documents with multiple parties, getting sign-offs and approvals from multiple parties, staying on top of contractual requirements, and collating evidence requested in litigation.

Options are offered for the various functions.

Read the article.