Key Considerations When Contracting Cloud

A post on the website of Baker McKenzie discusses what a general counsel should consider when looking at a contract for cloud and AI services.

“As cloud-based software will continuously change, the user cannot easily prove that certain functionality used to work fine, but is no longer available or working. For this reason it makes sense to check whether the key features are (or can be) described in a document and to refer to that description in the agreement,” according to the post.

The discussion covers moving to another provider, verification that everything is in check, and spelling out the right restrictions on use of data.
