Encountering Common Technology Contracts

Corporate counsel often hire external technology lawyers to review, draft, or negotiate technology contracts such as software licensing agreements because of their ability to identify software licensing issues, resolve complex licensing models, and compare the subject deal to the many other unique technology contract structures to solve problems, according to a blog post by Kirkpatrick Law.

There are a few technology contract types that should signal a need for a technology attorney to review, so the article lists some software examples to narrow the focus, but these could be true for other technology types.

The article covers one-sided enterprise agreements, the short and simple agreement, and the standard agreement.

Read the article.