Hillary Clinton's Email Archive Made Searchable by WikiLeaks

WikiLeaks has debuted a new section on its website that allows visitors to search thousands of messages from the private email server Hillary Clinton used while secretary of state, reports The Washington Times.

"While the newly-launched portal does not host any previously unreleased correspondence, its format enables users to quickly scour the 50,547 pages of documents that have already been put out by the State Department all at once for key words and phrases," the report says.

Emails previously released by the State Department show that some people close to Clinton were concerned after more than 200,000 diplomatic cables were shared with the secret-spilling group in 2010.
