House Republicans Just Voted to Change Overtime Rules for Workers

Image by NY Photographic

The U.S. House of Representatives voted to pass a bill that Republicans have promoted since the Newt Gingrich era, one that would allow private-sector employees to exchange overtime pay for "compensatory time" off, electing to accrue extra hours off rather than extra pay in their wallets, The Washington Post reports. The bill passed 229 to 197, largely along party lines.

"Under the proposed changes, eligible employees – if their employer decides to offer the option – would be able to voluntarily choose to receive comp time they can bank and use at a future date in lieu of immediate overtime pay in their paychecks," reporter Jena McGregor explains. "If they change their minds and want the pay after all, employees would have the option of 'cashing out,' with the employer required to pay the overtime within 30 days.

Some opponents of the legislation say they worry that employers will feel pressured to choose comp time.

Read the Washington Post article.

Join Our LinkedIn Group