

Law Firms are Already Inside Some US Wal-Marts

Like many lawyers, Evan Kaine, a personal injury attorney in Atlanta, had seen the statistic about how 80 percent of all low-income Americans have unmet civil legal needs. To that end, he came up with the idea to set up shop in an area where most of those underrepresented people shop: local Wal-Mart stores, according to a report in the ABA Journal.

His firm, Kaine Law, has offices inside three Atlanta-area Wal-Marts. Kaine says that he opened his first Wal-Mart office in 2012 before expanding to two additional stores last year.

“Kaine says his offices are full-service, although he emphasizes that he has built up relationships with a number of other local firms that specialize in different areas of the law and often refers work to them,” says the report by Victor Li. “In fact, he estimates that he only keeps about 20 percent of the cases that come into the Wal-Mart offices. Kaine says the Wal-Mart offices operate on a fixed-fee basis and even offer a number of free services, including a basic last will and testament and notary public services.”

The article also describes another firm’s efforts in Missouri.

Read the article.