

Law Schools Where Starting Salaries for Graduates Exceed Their Student Loan Debt

Above the Law takes a look at a U.S. News & World Report survey that ranks law schools with the highest salary-to-debt ratios among 2017 graduates.

“There are several law schools that are not only highly ranked, but whose graduates are very well-compensated after graduation – in fact, they’re so well-compensated that it makes up for the high costs of their education,” explains Above the Law senior editor Staci Zaretsky.

The top 10 list includes Howard University, with a salary-to-debt ratio of 2.35 to 1. On the other end is the University of North Carolina-Chapel Hill with a ratio of 1.51 to 1.

Read the Above the Law article.