

Plaintiffs' fortitude: It's an admirable must when battling corporate fat cats

"While too many of us get overdosed with clownish depictions – from doctors, hospitals, insurers, and corporations, especially Big Pharma firms – of how the civil justice system operates, it's always worth a reminder of the tremendous fortitude ordinary folks show in pursuing malpractice and other personal injury or liability claims," reports Patrick Malone in JD Supra.

"Yes, the cases, on rare occasions, can result in sizable favorable rulings for plaintiffs, as the public might be reminded by the U.S. Supreme Court's new refusal to overturn a $2.1 billion judgment against Johnson & Johnson."
