

Thomson Reuters Launches eDiscovery Point

Thomson Reuters has released a new product called eDiscovery Point, which the company says can transform the legal market with a faster and easier-to-use platform.

“eDiscovery Point gives legal professionals unprecedented control from processing through production,” the company says in a release. “The new platform combines Thomson Reuters robust power, security and service excellence with cutting-edge technology.”

“Our recent survey of the market found that 9 out of 10 legal professionals in this space felt there was room for improvement with their current solutions,” said Eric Laughlin, managing director of Legal Managed Services for Thomson Reuters. “They want access to ediscovery technology that is more intuitive, faster and more powerful. We reimagined the ediscovery process with eDiscovery Point, building a new platform from the ground up, incorporating feedback from our design partner firms and insights from our in-house managed review team, who have reviewed more than 125 million documents in just the past two years. The result is a tool that lawyers can walk up to and use, with the speed, accuracy and reliability you expect from Thomson Reuters.”

Read the release.