

What All the Biglaw Firms are Saying About Future Russia Business

“In the days following the invasion of Ukraine, we saw responses from a number of major law firms with business in Russia shut down their offices and withdraw from representations. But some firms didn’t make a clean break with Russian business, and some that did issued cagey statements that made the,” reports Joe Patrice in Above The Law.

“The page divides firm statements between firms no longer doing work in Russia – like MoFo and Gowling WLG – firms that have dropped Russian government-related entities – like DLA Piper, Norton Rose, and Hunton Andrews Kurth – and firms that are either silent or issued equivocal statements. Looking through the list of inconclusive.”

Read the article.